

OREGON BIRD RECORDS COMMITTEE

2019 REPORT

by Craig Miller and the OBRC

The Oregon birding community remains vibrant, as evidenced by the 68 records that the Oregon Bird Records Committee (OBRC) made determinations on throughout 2019. During the year, 58 records were accepted and 10 were not accepted. Six of the accepted records were new state records, bringing the Official State Checklist to 543 species. Two of those new species were found in 2018, but accepted in 2019.

Only one of the six new Oregon species was available for public viewing. A pair of male Eastern Bluebirds was discovered on Nov 25, 2018 by Eric Carlson in a field adjacent to the Dharma Rain Zen Center in Portland and remained at least through mid-February 2019, allowing ample time for birders from around the state to enjoy the spectacle. Less satisfying, a Zone-tailed Hawk was photographed near Medford on Oct 25, 2018, but not identified until days later after it had long departed. Likewise, on May 16, 2019 a Red-footed Booby landed on a fishing boat off Newport, allowing crew person Don Bok to get a photograph before it left. Frustrating for many twitchers, a Dusky Thrush showed up in a Tigard back yard on Feb 26, 2019, but was not reported until 10 days after it was last seen on March 8. Most unfortunate, Oregon's first accepted Nazca Booby was found dead on South Beach, Lincoln County. Finally, looking back to ancient history, two birds collected on the east side of Steens Mountain in August 1921 by Stanley Jewett (and now specimens in the Smithsonian) became Oregon's first (and only) accepted Woodhouse's Scrub-Jay record.

The OBRC, a committee of the Oregon Birding Association, met in Portland on Jul 27, 2019 to discuss and vote on records that were too problematic to resolve remotely. It also discussed and approved an overhaul to its Rules of Operation. The Rules now clarify that the OBRC has two main purposes: maintenance of the Official Checklist of Oregon Birds; and maintenance of the Permanent Archive of Records of rare birds in Oregon. The Rules also clarified that records can fall into one of three categories: 1) Accepted; 2) Species Unresolved; and 3) Not Accepted. The "Species Unresolved" category recognizes that the reported species is one of two or more similar appearing species, both or all of which are review species.

If you are interested in learning more about the OBRC, accessing the Official Checklist, or how to report a rare bird, you can find that information on the Oregon Birding Association website at <https://oregonbirding.org/oregon-bird-records-committee/>
